SPIDER VEIN TREATMENT

What is the difference between Spider Veins and Varicose Veins?

Surface veins including spider veins are smaller versions of varicose veins. Although surface veins are part of the same network of varicose veins, these are smaller branches of the network of veins that are visible on the surface of the skin. You're more likely to have spider veins and underlying varicose veins if other members of your family have had them. Standing or sitting for long periods of time, age, trauma or pregnancy makes you more susceptible.

Now you can have a baby and keep your legs too!

How do I know if I have Varicose Veins?

Varicose veins are symptomatic, including the underlying venous insufficiency. Varicose veins may present as spider veins, bulging veins, edema (swelling), hyperpigmentation (discoloration), ulcers, or they may not be visible at all.

SPIDER VEIN Appearance & Treatment Imaging

We treat veins all day, every day.

How do you treat Spider Veins?

We have many tools available and one of our Board Certified Providers will see you to determine which would be ideal for your individual needs. Frequently we use a combination of tools since surface veins come in different shapes and sizes and they have variable sources. Typically we like to identify the source either using ultrasound or a special light that allows us to see deeper into the skin. By nailing down the source, we can get you better, long term relief in fewer sessions.

How many treatments will I need?

One of our Board Certified Providers will see you and make the determination. Typically more than one session is required and will depend on your individual condition and also your expectations.

Treatment of spider veins is considered cosmetic, hence cannot be billed to insurance.
